Love's Labour's Lost is a strange little play, and was my read for March for the #ShakeTheStacks Challenge. It starts with a King asking for his male courtiers to join him in a vow of celibacy (because women are a distraction from enlightenment) and leads to, of course, these men (including the King himself) meeting

Not so in this comedy, and that's part of the charm of Love's Labor's Lost. It's an early play in the Shakespeare canon, unique in how it ends, unique in that the voice of Berowne's is Shakespeare's own, unique in that the plot is solely Shakespeare's, and unique too in that the ending sequence of Act V.2 is the longest continuous sequence in all of the Bard's plays
